Aspen Medical provides healthcare to the far-flung regions of the Northern Territory

WITH innovative medical solutions, Aspen Medical is the premier provider of healthcare services to remote regions and areas of high demand.

What people may not realise is Aspen Medical's presence and commitment to providing health service delivery solutions in the Northern Territory.

As an Australian-based, international healthcare provider, Aspen has consistently stuck to its area of expertise — delivering healthcare solutions to environments that are remote, challenging and under-resourced — since it was established in Canberra in 2003.

In late 2008, Aspen Medical created its subsidiary company, the Remote Area Health Corps (RAHC), to help strengthen primary health care services in remote indigenous communities in the NT.

With the ability to provide teams of health professionals, mobile medical facilities, training and highly refined medical processes and procedures, Aspen has expanded its healthcare support to government and private organisations both locally and globally.

"We really look at providing healthcare outcomes," Aspen Medical's managing director Glenn Keys says. "We can provide the facilities, equipment, people, pharmaceuticals, consumables and ambulances as much or as little as a customer needs to get the healthcare they're seeking."

So who is Aspen Medical?

After recognising that the healthcare market needed an experienced healthcare delivery company with innovative solutions, Glenn Keys created Aspen Medical with his high school friend, Dr Andrew Walker.

The duo's combined knowledge and experience proved to be a great foundation for Aspen Medical, as Keys had served in the Australian Defence Force for 14 years and had received mechanical and aerospace engineering training. Dr Walker has two medical degrees from Newcastle University and was once a platoon commander in Australia's Parachute Battalion.

It didn't take long for Aspen Medical to develop a strong presence in Australia. In 2008, the company expanded to establish Aspen Medical USA to support and enhance capabilities in the US market.

Its global presence also includes the Pacific region, South East Asia, the Middle East and the UK.
