Community Development Minister John Ah Kit MLA will travel to the remote Aboriginal communities of Yarralin, Lajamanu and Ali Curung to discuss and promote the NT Government's Aboriginal Law and Justice Strategy this week.

Mr Ah Kit will be accompanied by Federal Aboriginal Affairs Minister Phillip Ruddock.

Mr Ah Kit said the Aboriginal Law and Justice Strategy promotes community-based decision making using locally based Law and Justice Committees. The committees use a combination of Aboriginal tradition and on the ground solutions to justice and safety issues.

"We have to use all means at our disposal to deliver safer communities," Mr Ah Kit said.

"Law and Justice Committee members are the frontline workers dealing with family and community violence. They comprise workers from safe houses and night patrols, tribal councils, community elders, traditional land owners and other relevant people from the three communities involved who are working together to address local law and justice concerns.

"Our Government is committed to encouraging greater community responsibility and control for addressing family and community violence.

"The three communities involved in the Kurduju Committee (Lajamanu, Ali Curung and Yuendemu) have all implemented Aboriginal Dispute Resolution (ADR) mechanisms as a key component for community problem solving.

"The Aboriginal Law and Justice Committees use participatory planning and this is one of the few examples of such an approach being undertaken in law and justice. The process incorporates community plans, agreements, whole of community and whole of government arrangements and the enhancement of service delivery.

"ATSIC has expressed national interest in our Aboriginal Law and Justice Strategy and one of the reasons for the trip with Minister Ruddock is to show him how we are achieving gains in law and justice, particularly in the area of family and community violence.

"Engaging the community in internal problem solving through their dispute resolution groups is a major part of the strategy."
