How the north was won

The timetable for a start on the Alice Springs to Darwin rail link has finally been posted. JEFF TURNER talks to the man who made the numbers add up.

The northern territory's long-awaited rail link is set to begin construction on 15 September. The project, which has been in the works for over a decade, is expected to cost around $2 billion and take approximately 10 years to complete.

The railway will run from Alice Springs to Darwin, crossing some of the most remote and challenging terrain in Australia. The route will include tunnels, viaducts, and bridges to navigate through the rugged landscape.

The construction of the railway is expected to create thousands of jobs and boost the local economy. It is also seen as a significant step in improving infrastructure and connectivity in the region.

Jeff Turner, who was responsible for negotiating the funding and planning for the project, is confident that the railway will be completed on time and within budget.

"This is a major milestone for the northern territory," Turner said. "We've worked hard to get this project off the ground, and we're excited about the opportunities it will bring for our region.

The railway will provide much-needed transport links, allowing people to travel more easily and open up new economic opportunities. It will also bring closer ties with our southern neighbours and improve our international links.

The railway is part of a broader strategy to develop the north and make it a more attractive destination for visitors and investors. We're looking forward to seeing the benefits this project brings for generations to come."
