Digging deep holes in the heat for pitfall traps may not sound like everyone’s cup of tea, but you get the impression that Great Southern’s environmental crew have more fun at work than most of us would find on a weekend fishing trip.

Maybe that’s because they get to see some of the island’s most beautiful scenery and no mobile phones ring where they travel.

Their work has a serious purpose however: to ensure that forestry is friendly to the environment.

The team has dug more than 1800 holes in the past year to survey the land for Butler’s Dunnarts, a threatened species that is known only from the North Kimberley in Western Australia and the Tiwi Islands.

What’s more, it’s often not just dunnarts that are captured, but scorpions, centipedes and whip snakes and other small mammals, adding a little excitement to the environment crew’s work.

Whenever Great Southern selects a new area as suitable for forestry, it is surveyed for slope and soils, proximity to creeks, wetlands and rainforest, and threatened species.

Butler’s dunnarts are active only at night. So to look for dunnarts in the forestry blocks, the environmental team sets up survey areas of three lines of 100 metre fences, with 10 buckets every 10 metres.

The idea is that if a Butler’s Dunnart (which looks like a rat) lives in the area it will walk into the survey fences, run along the fence and then fall safely into a bucket. Early in the morning, the environmental crew goes back to rescue the dunnart, measure and weigh it, and let it go.

Whenever a dunnart is found, an exclusion zone is established to protect its habitat.

In November, we found the environmental crew camping out at Jessie Creek, on the north of Melville Island. In this small block, 90 traps have been set under the guidance of team leader, Jodie Millsom.
The Tiwi Islands Training and Employment Board seek expressions of interest from suitably qualified persons to fill several positions on the Tiwi Islands.

The Board is looking for people with qualifications and experience in Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages (TESOL) or English as a Second Language (ESL) or Adult Literacy and Numeracy. Previous experience in managing a Language, Literacy and Numeracy Program would be an advantage.

The successful applicants will have the ability to work with Indigenous clients on the Tiwi Islands.

These are new positions to commence before the end of March, 2008. This is an opportunity to join the vibrant, dedicated TITEB team.

Attractive salary packages will be offered for these positions. Interested parties can visit our website at www.titeb.com for information on the activities of the Tiwi Islands Training and Employment Board.
